COLORADO MEN RESCUE BOY; SEE HIS COMPANION BROWN
Walsenburg, Colo., May 8.—With the finding of the body of Clyde Holman, 11 years old, son of T. M. Holman, in the bottom of the La Veta mill lake, the story of heroism of two unknown men who attempted the rescue of the lad, came to light.

With the Holman boy at the time was Herbert Van Eiten. As the two boys found themselves unable to longer help each other, according to the story told by Van Eiten, they saw two strange men appear on the lake banks. They called for help and the strangers entered an old and leaky boat and endeavored to reach the boy, propelling their craft with one oar.

Realizing that progress in the boat would be so slow as to be fatal for the little fellows, one of them plunged into the icy snow waters and swam to Holman and Van Eiten. He caught him and tread water with him, waiting for his companion in the boat to reach.

Before the boat reached them, however, all three sank, and when the stranger was able to force himself to the surface, he found the boy and Van Eiten. The boy, the hero thrust his charge into the arms of the other stranger and instantly dived again in search of Holman. He disappeared in the water and was never seen again.

Nearby residents were attracted to the lake by sounds of commotion, and when the boat with its wet burden of humanity reached the shore, the Van Eiten boy was seized by a dozen hands. In the commotion the two rescuers disappeared and have not been heard of since.
